RE: Women Voters and Sarah Palin

On behalf of EMILY's List, Garin-Hart-Yang Research Group conducted a national survey among 800 women voters to assess their reactions to and perceptions of Sarah Palin as John McCain's running mate. Interviewing was conducted on August 31 and September 1, 2008. The margin of error for the findings is ± 3.5 percentage points.

Independently of any late-breaking news regarding Sarah Palin's family situation, the results of this poll for EMILY's List among women voters clearly demonstrate that John McCain selection of Governor Palin as his running mate will create more of a drag than a lift on the Republican ticket.

First, this selection puts John McCain squarely in the realm of politics over principle in women voters' eyes. Women voters see the choice of Governor Palin as being driven by politics rather than by any sense of conviction on Senator McCain's part that she has the experience and qualities to make a good vice president. Women voters' view of McCain's selection of Palin contrasts sharply to their view of Barack Obama's selection of Joe Biden as his running mate.

Second, Sarah Palin’s background and personal narrative are not particularly appealing to women voters, and she matches up poorly against Joe Biden in terms of the potential to establish a compelling narrative.

Appeal Of Vice Presidential Candidates

	Appeals A Lot %	Appeals A Fair Amount %	Total Appeal %
Sarah Palin is forty-four years old and has served two years as governor of Alaska. Before that, her experience in elected office was as mayor of Wasilla, Alaska, a suburban city of seven thousand people, and as a member of the Wasilla City Council. She also served as the ethics chair of the Alaska Oil and Gas Commission. Palin has a reputation as a reformer and has taken on leaders of her own party in Alaska to oppose what she describes as wasteful pork barrel spending and political corruption. Palin opposes abortion, including in cases of rape and incest, and, like John McCain, she favors overturning Roe versus Wade. She opposes stem cell research, and is opposed to most gun-control laws. Palin and her husband are the parents of five children. Her last child was born with Down Syndrome earlier this year. If elected, Sarah Palin would be the first woman to hold national office as vice president.	25	16	41
Joe Biden is sixty-five years old and is completing his sixth term as a United States senator from Delaware. He is chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and previously served as chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. Biden has a reputation for staying true to his working-class roots, as well as for being one of the Senate's foremost experts on foreign policy issues. Biden favors leaving the decision on abortion up to the woman and her doctor. He wrote the crime bill with tough provisions to crack down on violence against women. He voted to authorize the war against Iraq, but has been a strong opponent of President Bush's handling of the war. Biden's first wife and a child were killed in a car crash shortly after he was elected to the Senate in 1972. He returned home to Delaware after the close of Senate business every night to be with his two remaining children, and he still commutes from Capitol Hill to Delaware every day."	41	23	64

Third, Governor Palin’s inclusion on the ticket squanders John McCain’s previous advantage over Barack Obama with regard to experience and readiness to lead. When women voters learn that Palin’s total experience in elective office includes two years as governor of Alaska, six years as mayor of a small suburban city, and four years on the city council, and that she has never served in Washington D.C. and has no foreign policy or national security experience, they express notable concern. In fact, a majority (52%) say that this information alone makes them less favorable to Palin (34% much less favorable, 18% somewhat less favorable).

Palin’s lack of experience actually is a double-edged sword for McCain in that having the expertise and background to be president was McCain’s single biggest advantage among women voters in a poll conducted earlier this month, just prior to the start of the Democratic Convention and the announcement of both parties' vice presidential selections. In that EMILY's List Women's Monitor survey (released 8/20/08 and available at www.emilyslist.org), John McCain lagged far behind Obama on numerous key leadership measures (including caring about and relating to people like you, working across party lines, being independent-minded, and having strong moral, family, and personal values), while McCain bested Obama on only two fronts—as a strong commander-in-chief and, his greatest marginal advantage, as someone with the experience, background, and knowledge to be president.

Fourth, several of Governor Palin's positions on issues, including her position on abortion, alienate large segments of the women's electorate and add to the perception that the GOP ticket is out of step with women voters' views and priorities.

Women Voters' Reactions To Sarah Palin's Issue Positions

How does this information affect your view of Sarah Palin?

She describes herself as “pro-life as any candidate can be,” and opposes abortion even in cases of rape and incest

She opposed funding optional pre-k in Alaska and cut nearly half a million dollars from a successful dropout prevention program

She opposes stem cell research

Fifth, even with the historic inclusion of a woman on the Republican ticket, women voters conclude that the Obama-Biden ticket is more in step with the issues and concerns that are important to women than is the McCain-Palin ticket.

Understanding The Issues And Concerns Important To Women

The more that Hillary Clinton's primary supporters learn about Sarah Palin, the less likely they are to support John McCain.

- By the end of the survey, a 55% majority of Clinton's voters say that Palin's inclusion on the ticket makes them less likely to vote for John McCain (just 9% say her presence on the ticket makes them more likely to support McCain).
- Obama goes from a 44-percentage-point lead (69% to 25%) to a 54-percentage-point lead (75% to 21%) over McCain among these Clinton voters as they learn more about Sarah Palin's background and her positions on core issues.

Finally, as these survey findings confirm, the Democratic presidential ticket of Barack Obama and Joe Biden continues to benefit from strong support of women voters. By an 11-percentage-point margin (52% to 41%), women voters support the Obama-Biden ticket over the McCain-Palin ticket, which places this Democratic ticket well ahead of Kerry-Edwards's performance among women voters in 2004 (+3 points Kerry/Edwards over Bush/Cheney).
